

Linguistics Prague 2018

Linguistics Prague is a conference aimed at graduate students of linguistics and related fields. Successfully running since 2013, the conference will be opened to international audience for the second time in 2018 with English as the language of the conference. Having become a well established event in Czech academia, the conference is now set to welcome international researchers. The focus/leitmotif of the conference is empirical research of language and its methodology. We encourage presentations of original data oriented research concerned with different aspects of language structure and use, as well as discussions of methodological groundings of the 'empirical turn' in linguistics.

This year, the programme consists of three days of plenary talks, sessions, workshops, and social activities.

The conference is co-organised by Czech Language Institute of the Czech Academy of Sciences and supported by the Charles University project „Progres Q10, Language in the shiftings of time, space, and culture“.
